In 2025, outdoor spaces are taking center stage. Picture a cozy fireplace nestled in a poolside oasis, seamlessly blending relaxation and sophistication. This year, the focus is on creating outdoor environments that feel like true extensions of your home—multi-functional, luxurious, and deeply connected to nature.

What sets these designs apart is the harmony between natural elements and smart technology. These spaces embody the perfect mix of style and sustainability, offering year-round retreats for unwinding or entertaining. To me, it's more than just aesthetics. It's about designing spaces that connect us to nature while showcasing the beauty of responsible living. Outdoor design in 2025 is all about elegance with purpose.

Professional artwork and original artistry as an integral component of today's alfresco living designs is a luxury trend growing in prominence. "The range of extraordinary art elements crafted for exterior spaces continues to exceed all expectations," relates Sozan Hughes, vice president and creative director, SOLANA Outdoor Living and Ryan Hughes Design. "For 2025, this trend of incorporating original handmade art is a key element in exterior designs and the creation of luxury outdoor rooms." Wall art pieces and sculpture have long occupied places of interest in exterior designs. Advances in durability and functionality is making it possible for original art to not only adorn but become one with designer surfaces and structural elements. Ryan Hughes Design and SOLANA Outdoor Living is known for its global sourcing of original works by artists whose designs offer long life in the out of doors. One such artist, Alex Turco is known for his breathtaking visuals. His work is now creating excitement and making a statement within Solana design projects. Decorative art resin panels by this internationally sought-after artist are elevating outdoor rooms with single panel motifs or floor to ceiling artistry or creating the unexpected with designs incorporated into waterfall walls or poolside living areas.
